as the normally done and are also a "true" picture of the normal micturition cycle. Nevertheless, the issue has been established over the last 40 years in accordance with the International Committee of Urodynamic Contractors Society (ICUS) and not performed in a similar fashion across the world. Therefore, abnormalities are interpreted in a standard way and have a common meaning in clinical practice.

The tests that are generally used include the following: Endflowmetry: Measuring the patient's flow rate when voiding in private, using a catheter that is connected to a collecting device that measures the rate of fall of urine upon the device.

Single cystometry: Inserting a single catheter into the bladder that measures pressure, with an insertion for abdominal pressure during a filling cycle, not widely used in the Western world.

Real channel advanced cystometry: Inserting a pressure recording line into the bladder as well as a filling catheter, along with an abdominal pressure recording line (used to assess that results in filling cycle). The abdominal pressure is measured during the filling phase to give the detrusor pressure (see Fig. 4.1 and later figures).

Voiding cystometry: The same as real channel cystometry above, but the patient is asked to void into a urinal connected while the pressure line was in place so that the contractility of the detrusor muscle during the voiding phase is measured.

Electromyography: The same as voiding cystometry above, but rectography. X-ray contrast dye is used to fill the bladder. The test is done in the X-ray department, and the bladder wall is filled during cough and other provocation to make filling in a controlled manner, voiding phase, but 40 % of women are not able to void in those public conditions (see next chapter on patient to check voiding).

Imaging (fluorography with ultrasound): The same as voiding cystometry, but ultrasound imaging is undertaken during cough and other provocation, and post-void images are taken.
